Best Rabbit breeds for pet and meat

Rabbits are reared due to many reasons ranging from their efficient reproduction to their low carbon emission to the environment. However, success in rabbit rearing often begins with selecting the right breed. The best breed of rabbit for rearing varies depending on your specific goals: whether for meat, fur or pet purposes.

Different rabbit breeds

New Zealand white. This breed is known for its large size and excellent meat production. They have a docile nature making them easy to handle and suitable for beginners. They also have good quality white fur making them a good choice for farmers.
California. Similar to the New Zealand white, California rabbits are also good meat producers. They have a distinct black coat with white fur on their belly, nose and feet. They are known for their high growth rate and feed conversion efficiency making it a good choice for meat producers.
Flemish giant. These are one of the largest rabbit breeds making them ideal for meat production.
Rex. These are known for their unique fur. They are smaller compared to other breeds but their fur is highly valued in the fur industry. These are also kept as pets due to their gentle temperament.
Silver fox. These are dual purpose rabbit breeds suitable for both meat and fur. They are medium sized and known for their hardiness.
Chinchilla rabbits. These are primarily reared for their fur.